"Black folks got white folks shaked up now."

The POLITICAL ECONOMY by Ed Meadows

Who's afraid of a budget deficit?

We are led to believe by sundry ideologues that government's only true goal is to achieve a balanced budget, that a budget deficit is the highest blasphemy and, more than that, is the quickest route to the inflationary freeway, a freeway presumed to end at the gates of Socialism. Conservatives have even convinced some less thoughtful Democrats to parrot cliches damning deficit budgets and government spending no matter what the state of the economy may be.

But now word comes from a bastion of economic conservatism that this anguish over the budget deficit is based on pure ignorance of how the budget operates. Keith Carlson, a Federal Reserve economist writing in the monthly Review of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, explains that a budgetary deficit can be harmless as well as dangerous, depending entirely on how it's financed. It is this theme we will explore in the following paragraphs. For such a conclusion, though it might be unremarkable to the practiced monetary economist, yet is not often suggested in a publication such as the St. Louis Fed Review , that journal being the principal keeper of the conservative monetarist flame (sparked by Milton Friedman) among the various Fed publications.

Carlson first notes that although the federal government's budget has been in deficit to the tune of an average $67 billion since early 1975, no disaster has occurred. Indeed, until a few weeks ago, the economy was thought to be proceeding apace with a healthy, or at least not totally anemic, recovery. So what happened? Why did we not, in the face of these large deficits, experience an orgy of inflation? GOP Treasury Secretary William Simon had wrung his hands over the dark inevitability of "crowding-out" by which government borrowing to cover the deficit would push up interest rates, thereby elbowing out small businesses that wanted to borrow money. It never happened. In fact, interest rates remain low and banks can't find enough businessmen to lend money to.

We can understand why it didn't happen by taking a close look at the federal budget itself. Recall that the national government receives money from individual income taxes, corporation income taxes, and Social Security taxes. For instance, in 1975 the government received $122.4 billion in indidual income taxes, $40.6 billion in corporation income taxes, and $118 billion in "other" revenues (with Social Security being spread among the three categories). In 1975 the government received a total of $281 billion. Now it spent $86.5 billion for national defense, $4.4 billion for international affairs, $136.3 billion for health and income security (social programs, including welfare and unemployment compensation) and $31 billion in interest payments, for a total expenditure of $324.6 billion. The difference between receipts and outlays is $281 billion minus $324.6 billion, or -$43.6 billion, the annual deficit.

> "... Carlson rightly contends that, to the extent a budget deficit is passive, it is harmless per se ..."

But we must separate the federal budget into its active and passive elements before we can interpret the importance or the harmlessness of any budget deficit. Using the schemata outlined by Carlson, we can consider the active element of the budget that amount of changes in receipts and outlays resulting from current legislation by Congress. These mostly include "discretionary" measures such as tax cuts or stimulative government spending, measure designed to promote national goals of economic growth, full employment and price stability. It is this active element of the budget that conservatives whine about when they preach upon the evils of government spending.

On the other hand, the passive element of the federal budget is defined as those changes in receipts and expenditures which are due to past Congressional legislation, changes which occur automatically and reflect the state of the national economy. A good example is unemployment compensation, for which the law requires that benefits change automatically in response to economic activity (the worse the economy gets, the higher and more extended are unemployment payments). But this change in outlays is automatic, and so is passive, and in addition works only in response to economic conditions.

Carlson rightly contends that, to the extent a budget deficit is passive, it is harmless per se. It reflects the feedback reactions of the government to worsening economic conditions. And he finds that given pre-recession government spending levels, the actual -$58.9 billion deficit in the first half of 1976 would have been a surplus of $1.9 billion if there had been no recession. In other words, the deficit was caused by the passive elements of the budget, i.e., increased outlays for unemployment compensation and welfare to help stabilize the recession. And why such a passive deficit is harmless will become clear in the explanation that follows.

Again the question: Why didn't the celebrated "crowding out" occur as Republicans swore it would? Because during the recession our deficit was a passive one, a deficit resulting from an economic slowdown, and it generated no large demand for loans from private businesses. They were in no shape to borrow, and were fearful of the future anyway. So government borrowing merely replaced private borrowing, rather than having

Ravenel and Hollings

Pug's end run

Former gubernatorial candidate Charles "Pug" Ravenel and junior South Carolina Senator Ernest "Fritz" Hollings may be eyeballing each other kind of suspiciously the next time they cross paths. Ravenel, following the reform-minded route that he began back in 1974, did an "end run" around the senior member of the democratic delegation from South Carolina, the traditional purveyor of patronage, by suggesting, in a letter addressed to state demo chairman Don Fowler, that merit be the only criterion used in selecting South Carolinians for jobs in the Carter administration.

The so-called leaders of the state democratic party, including Hollings and Ravenel, had been scheduled to meet Sunday past (Nov. 21) to discuss placement of South Carolinians in Carter administration jobs, but the meeting had to be scuttled when it was learned that Hollings would not be back from his China trip in time to attend. According to Ravenel, he had declined to attend the meeting and all such meetings that included only those party leaders invited by Fowler. (In addition to Hollings, Ravenel, and Fowler the meeting was to have included the five democratic congressional members, former Governor John West and present Lt. Governor Brantley Harvey).

Ravenel's reasoning for not wanting to attend the meeting and for writing the letter were the same. "I'm a newcomer to patronage and how it works," he told Osceola. "I kept reading the paper and seeing my name on invitation lists to come to Columbia and attend top level meetings and I just thought that was not right. I declined to attend those meetings before it ever hit the press just for the reasons that came out in my letter, because I didn't think that was the way to do it. What I was trying to do was counteract the identification of me with a system that I didn't endorse."

Ravenel said that he had not intended to make an end run around anyone. "I sent the letter to Don Fowler with the hope that the democratic party would adopt a mechanism which would have the party show the kind of leadership that I think is important. If I had wanted (to make an end run) I wouldn't have sent it to Don Fowler, I would have sent it to Jimmy Carter. I wasn't trying to be argumentative, I was just trying to make a suggestion that I thought had merit and I hope it was taken that way." Ravenel's letter to Fowler follows:

Dear Don:

Widespread discussion of patronage from the Carter administration to South Carolinians has disturbed me. I do not believe in the principle of patronage as it has traditionally been exercised and would like to offer an alternative program.

My suggestion to you, and to Fritz Hollings and Dick Riley, is that a series of selection panels be formed. Upon the initiative of the Carter people requesting recommendations of South Carolianians, these panels would be ready to provide suggestions.

I propose six South Carolina talent panels to represent consumers, minorities (blacks and women), young people, lawyers and businessmen. These panels would have sent to them all job requests; they would review the resumes and rank them. One criterion and one only would determine relative rank: merit. By merit I mean demonstrated competence, intergrity, honesty, willingness to work and effectiveness. Please note the absence from my list of such traditional measures as experience, service to Carter in his campaign, early commitment and money donated.

The merit rankings for each of the six groups would constitute the arrangement of job requests in an orderly and fair manner. But this alone would be incomplete. The panels should then take those exceptionally qualified South Carolinians who have not asked for a job and include them in each category. In public service, it is important not only to look for the best amongst the available, but to take the best there is and by persuasion make them available.

These two groups, those who have asked and those who have not asked, ranked by merit alone, should make up the South Carolina job recommendations list. We should then like gentlemen, in deference to the President Elect, wait for the initiative to come from the Carter Administration, not in plundering fashion presume to push names without being asked.

This is how I would do it, and this is how I believe President Carter would want it.

Charles D. Ravenel

Traditionally patronage has meant that to the winners go the spoils. The leaders of the winners normally get the privilege of cutting up the pie, and more often than not, the party faithful get the pieces. That is to say that there are a lot of Carter supporters out there who are looking for reward--not that they set out with that in mind, but that if there are jobs to be had in the new administration, who is more deserving than they? There is always talk, of course, of merit and qualifications and competence and so on, but when you get right down to it, this kind of talk is like the talk about what an important role the vice-President will play in the new administration, just that: talk. What counts far and above all else is where you were when J.C. called the roll.

As you would expect, there is agreement--in principle though not in degree--among democratic party leaders with Ravenel's idea, but perhaps they think it a bit naive on Ravenel's part to hope that any totally non-partisan system could be used. Regardless of how much talk there has been by the Carter administration people about selecting the most qualified rather than the most faithful, it would be a bit silly to think that the brightest and the best are necessarily at the front of the line. This is especially true when you drop down to the state and local levels, where state party leaders call the shots.

State party chairman Don Fowler reacted to the idea this way: "I think in terms of emphasis that political loyalty should be given a little stronger bow than he (Ravenel) suggested. That is not to say, by any stretch of the imagination, that you should put some political hack in a job just because he has been on your side for "x" number of years. In terms of who can do it, we have plenty of people who are totally capable by technical competence and merit to fill these jobs."

State Carter Steering Committee Chairman Richard Riley, Democratic Senator from Greenville also agreed with the Ravenel idea in principle, but he believed that Ravenel's suggestion had already, in essence, been adopted by the Carter Steering Committee in a meeting of Carter supporters at the Carolina Inn last week. The former Carter workers were divided up into small groups from each Congressional District where five people from each group were chosen to serve as conduits back and forth between the state and the Carter administration in Washington, including but not limited to the task of suggesting or forwarding the names of individuals to be considered for patronage positions. Riley told Osceola: "We are talking about jobs and going beyond that to access to the administration for other purposes."

According to Riley the information fed into Washington will all be stored in a computer to be used by the Carter people when selection time comes around. People gathered at the Carolina Inn meeting, according to another source, were told that there are "x" number of jobs available and were given instructions on how they could go about getting their resumes into the computer. The source added that the meeting had a scavenger aspect about it, with former campaign workers vying for jobs.

Riley also squelched rumors that had been floating around that he believed that he was being "snubbed" by members of the state party who had really been "johnny comelatelies to the Carter camp." "I'm not going to make any judgements about what other people are trying to do," he said. Riley said his responsibility is to see to it that the selection process remains as broad in scope as possible. Riley said that there seemed to be other factions that were trying to narrow the scope of selection, but that he had his responsibilities and that he would do what he had to do.

Neither Fowler nor Riley has talked with Ravenel since the letter went out, and neither has a clear understanding of how the panels suggested in Ravenel's letter would be set up. Fowler thought you could imply that Ravenel meant to have the Carter administration decide who would be on the panels. Riley said he had no idea how they would be chosen. Ravenel told Osceola he thought that since he addressed the letter to Fowler and sent copies to Hollings and Riley that his intention that they select the panels was clear. "Fritz is the leading elected democrat in the state, Dick Riley ran the Carter campaign, and Fowler is the leader of the state party. The message was to them, an obvious suggestion to them. Somebody's got to do the picking. Committees on top of committees is what buries the efficiency of government. I don't care who picks them--I care what they're like. If they are small enough to be workable, and are representative panels that really do operate on merit, then it doesn't matter who picks them."

The Ravenel idea is a good one, and so is the one adopted by the Steering Committee for that matter. The real question, however, is whether or not and in what degree either of the plans are bought by the state party leaders. The meeting originally set for the 21st of November has been rescheduled for December 18th. This is where the decision as to who gets what will more than likely be made in spite of panels or groups of any nature. Like it or not, patronage is a part of the political reality of old world politicians. Regardless of how antiquated the system may be, and in spite of the fact that the country and the state are in need of best we can muster, there is little doubt that patronage is going to play as important a role as it has ever played. No question that there are competent and qualified individuals among the party faithful, no argument that there will be an effort made to pick the best from among them or at least an effort to appear to so pick, but patronage will have its day--as always.

Why did Ravenel do it? He probably did want to disassociate himself from what many people were beginning to view as his full-fledged participation in the party's inner circle. Back in '74 Ravenel got a lot of votes because he was truly a reform candidate who didn't play by the rules, but increasingly, since that time, he has been seen playing "footsies" with the other "party boys." This is the first time, in a long time that he has struck out like the Ravenel of old. Of course, the '78 elections are not so far off in the future, and Carter may have proved, to some minds, at least, that the early bird really does get the worm.

augmented it. No one was crowded out. There was no upward pressure on interest rates caused by excess demand. Hence the deficit was not inflationary.

The crucial difference in the economic effects of passive as opposed to active elements of the federal budget deficit is to be found in how the deficit is financed. (This refers to governmental borrowing to make up the shortfall in receipts.) For if the deficit is passive, government borrowing to finance it, as we have already noted, generates no excess demand for money. Instead it merely offsets the reduced loan demand of the private sector. Thus the interest rate is not raised and no inflation-cum-recession is created. If the deficit is active, then in fact there could be harm, when governmental demand for borrowing adds to an already high level of loan demand by private business and therefore creates heavy upward pressure on interest rates.

But an active deficit is unlikely, even rare, for when the economy is in full swing, government receipts from individual and corporate income taxes, from all sources, increase, while transfer payments (welfare and unemployment compensation) decline. In a full-employment economy what is more likely is a surplus, with no increase in inflation.

All this, of course, is heresy to Republican demagogues.

Jazz-pop-rock at Clemson

Anticipatory is the word to use to describe the mood of the crowd that was packing into Clemson University's Tillman Hall. Expected was flautist Tim Weisberg and band. The concert had been highly touted in the student media and his music, a mixture of jazz-pop-rock had been termed "indescribably delicious." The crowd was quite a contrast to the rows of cadets that once sat in the pews of this strangely Southern romanesque chapel built as part of the oldest campus construction; that is, if you have an overactive sense of history as some of us do. The stage had a functional set-up that included an assortment of keyboards, lights that traveled with the show and at center stage a battery of flutes standing at attention. Unfortunately, because of the speakers and the size of the stage, a good number of the seats were less than satisfying.

Weisberg has six albums out to date and seems to be something of a cult figure with a dedicated following that is growing all the time. Most people seem to be like me, and have heard an album here and a cut there, but are really not that familiar with his total recorded material. I was expecting to hear something I liked. It just seemed inevitable.

The lights went down and the crowd reacted as Weisberg and the band came out on the stage. Weisberg was smiling in blue jean bells and blue nylon Adidas. Everybody looked young and competent, but not serious, until they start playing. The first number had a medium rocking beat, and Weisberg was bobbing and weaving in his sneakers. It ended with a repetitive guitar-flute phrase, and before there is time for much applause, the guitar started a fanning rhythm and the bass added a funky line. The basic sound is roughly like Herbie Mann only more rock and less pop. During an undistuinguished organ solo, Weisberg squinted past the lights and checked the crowd with his hawkish gaze. After the song, he explains in a casually informative manner that he is glad to be here and the first two songs have yet to be recorded. As the crowd applauds he adds that if we like them, he'll go back to L.A. to record them.

Later in the show, Weisberg, sounding like an F.M. DJ, introduced the band members: Todd Anderson on lead guitar and Douglas 'Trail' Anderson on bass guitar, "who grew up together in the suburbs;" Lynn Blessing on keyboards and T. Ryan on drums. He also talked of his time on the suburb circuit and fraternity parties and even the football halftime show. From all this you got a definite feeling that this is a second generation Los Angeles band, young and brought up in the West Coast musical tradition.

Blessing switches to vibraphone for a song with a jazzier flavor. Then a lengthy introduction of guitar arpeggios and synthesizer and a haunting melodic flute line that suddenly shifts to a harder beat with the addition of the drummer. This fades into an uptempo rocking passage that stirs childhood memories of early Ian Anderson and Jethro Tull. The band works for a build-up to a peak of energy, but the balance is a little off and they're not quite together. The crowd accepts this as a high spot and applauds accordingly.

> "... the basic sound is like Herbie Mann only more rock and less pop..."

Weisberg announces an acoustic set which he says might be a little more familiar to some present. This acoustic set, with Todd and Doug on 6-string guitars provided some of the best music of the concert. Two songs worth a mention were "Dion Blue" and "California Memories." Weisberg's flute work ws accessible and he played with a variety of his flute equipment. The songs were more melodic, and the flute and vibraphone combined well, at times moody and somber, then seguing into lilting passages reminiscent of Joni Mitchell's band in the "Court and Spark" period.

Low points of the show included an over-long, neo-class ical assorted-keyboard solo by Blessing, and intermittent guitar solos from Todd Anderson which too often sounded like a pastiche of stock riffs and effects. Unfortunately, "Trail" Anderson on bass with his floppy bangs and pouty grimaces kept looking something like Haley Mills. A personal problem, but nevertheless distracting.

In spite of these problems, the last part of the concert had very nice spots when the band was tight. One composition (which was an old one and familiar to most of the audience, but not to me) flowed well from a mellow, unison flute and guitar section to effective full band sounds and ended with a convincing energy release. On another, Weisberg on bass flute began a moody, rhythmic, jungle-ish solo that introduced a moody, jungle-ish drum break. This turned into a duel between Ryan and Weisberg, who was using the percussive effect of the pads of his flute to produce a ticking sound.

At the conclusion, the band left the stage and a leather-jacketed L.A. roadie came out in his patched blue jeans and a Clemson t-shirt and slouched around guarding Tim's flute equipment. The crowd cheered for the encore and the band returned to do "Bruiser," a favorite from the fourth album, and that seemed to satisfy the crowd.

I wasn't particularly satisfied. The band had not sounded as tight as a band like it ought to sound. Occasional flashes of good music and virtuosity were diluted with some very ordinary rock and roll stuff. Weisberg stood out as the best musician and a charismatic figure, but too often he and his flute were lost in the background. On his earlier albums, he used session men like Jim Fordon, Larry Knechtal and others, which, combined with the results you get in a controlled studio setting, may account for a lot of discrepancies in the sound of this performance. Remember, too, that this was at the end of a fairly long tour, and Weisberg had chosen to present a lot of new material that may be more polished in recorded form. At any rate, I was disappointed. I went to be enlightened and came away with just another band from L.A.

Weisberg on Weisberg

Editor's note: Music correspondent Barbara Ballinger interviewed Weisberg after his concert in Charlotte. Here is her report:

Although he is intensely aware of his audience, Tim Weisberg immerses himself in his music onstage; even so, he is far from aloof. Offstage he is one of those endlessly receptive and patient people who can talk to fans for hours and never run out of smiles. First and foremost a performer, he thrives on audience contact and depends on their feedback in his determination of new musical directions.

Weisberg's six albums have gained him a hard-core group of followers and a certain degree of public recognition which he finds pleasing. "It's really nice positive reinforcement, getting those strokes, and it just makes it easier to continue creating the music," he says happily. "It gives me more energy; like, wow, they like what I'm doing I'm gonna do more of it, quicker, faster, better."

> "...It gives me more energy; like, wow, they like what I'm doing. I'm gonna do more of it, quicker, faster, better..."

Weisberg has found that his audiences seem to prefer a certain variety in his music, rather than a concentration on one particular style, a tendency that suits him just fine. "Some people love the accoustic stuff, and some people just go nuts over the stuff that cooks. I think the balance is the key thing between the two. I don't think you can separate one from the other."

Weisberg's development of this type of sound has followed a long and circuitous path. His initial training was classical, which provided him with a solid foundation in theory and technique but was no help in learning to improvise. Support and encouragement from other musicians, particularly his mentor Fred Katz, professor and friend, helped him along. His interest soon turned to rock. "The thing that I like about rock and roll is its melodies. I love melodies, I like melodic music. And I like rhythmic music, something that I can really get my teeth into, and that's probably why I was drawn into rock and roll." Weisberg early acquired a reputation as a jazz musician, however, a label he has yet to totally leave behind him, despite his repeated disclaimers of any expertise in jazz. The whole idea got started, he says, when he opened the Monterey Jazz Festival in 1970, which he did purely as a means of exposure. Since rock and roll involves much larger amounts of money than does jazz, and therefore includes a lot of politicking, "it was much easier for me, no matter how prestigious the event was, to talk my way into opening the Monterey Jazz Festival than it was to do the Monterey Pop Festival. I was able to get on (the Monterey Jazz Festival) just on the basis of the music."

As his final, irrefutable proof that he is not and never has been a jazz musician, Weisberg cites the fact that Duke Ellington and John Lewis of the Modern Jazz Quartet had discussed his music at the festival," and ironically enough, after all these years of people describing me, or trying to describe me as a jazz musician, erroneously, these three gentlemen ..... expressed a great interest in my music, said they love it -- and completely decided that it wasn't jazz. If anybody would know better than them, I can't imagine who it would be."

Currently Weisberg views his music as a free-association sort of flow of words and ideas, sensory impressions, "plus a lot of other things that are just sort of floating around." Constantly on the lookout for "flavorenhancers" for his music, Weisberg is thinking of adding a visual dimension to the show. He hopes that the new-found economic stability that came with his recent switch from A&M to United Artists will enable him to experiment more than he has been able to in the past. He seeks growth, and new dimensions; somehow it seems that a rock and roll flutist would be pretty good at finding both.

COLUMBIA EAST I THEATRE, 7369 Garner's Ferry Road, 776-0350

"Two Minute Warning." 90,000 panicky fans rush for the exits when a sniper opens up on the superbowl. You can almost hear those wheels inside the pea brains of studio execs turning in this giant sized version of "Airport" or any of the other disaster pictures. The R rating is not for skin. Charlton Heston, John Cassavetes, Gena Rowlands, David Jansen and Jack Klugman.

DUTCH SQUARE NORTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"Two Minute Warning" plays here as well. Same times.

DUTCH SQUARE SOUTH THEATRE, Dutch Square Mall, 798-1110

"Super Bug, Super Agent." G rated kiddie flick from the Barbara half of Hanna-Barbara. G. 5, 6:30, and 8 with 2 and 3:30 features on the weekend.

FOX THEATRE, 1607 Main Street, 254-5212

"The Night Daniel Died." Some kind of horror movie. R. 1:40, 3:30, 5:20, 7:10 and 9.

GAMECOCK I THEATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022

"Across the Great Divide." Wilderness adventure with a family of cute kids. G. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9; 1 and 3 shows for the weekend only.

GAMECOCK II THEATRE, Parkland Plaza Shopping Center, 796-0022

"Shout at the Devil." American International spent big money on this elaborate adventure movie about World War I, Africa, Lee Marvin and Roger Moore, but the results look more like a glorified TV series. Still there's Barbara Parkins to ogle at and Ian Holm for some more subtle acting than Marvin-Moore. PG. 2:30, 4:45, 7:15, 9:30. Only in the evening during the week.

JEFFERSON SQUARE THEATRE, Jefferson Square Downtown, 254-6731

"Face to Face." A clinical psychologist (Liv Ullmann) experiences personality disintegration in this new Ingmar Bergman feature that was made originally for Swedish TV. The movie has a startling and harrowing performance by Ullman, but it's mostly just bleakness for bleakness sake -- it never really grapples with it's subject. Bergman has previously taken on God and marriage, but personality seems to have been too big a subject even for him. Still, any film by Bergman is worth seeing. With Gunnar Bjorstrand, Erland Josephson. R. 1:40, 5:20, 7:10, and 9. Daytime shows for the weekend only.

MIRACLE THEATRE, 1228 Main Street, 256-1950

"Marathon Man." A cold and ugly thriller about a New York grad student (Dustin Hoffman) who finds himself hunted by a fiendish ex-Nazi (Laurence Olivier) and his ring of diamond smugglers.
ring of diamond smugglers. A cheerless entertainment. With William Devane, Roy Scheider, Marthe Keller. Written by William Goldman. 2:15, 4:45, 7:45, and 9:45.

PALMETTO THEATRE, 1417 Main Street, 254-5800.

"The Front." Woody Allen's first "straight" role is this new film about a restaurant cashier who becomes rich and famous when a friend, who has been blacklisted by redbaiting investigators of the McCarthy fifties, asks him to front — to put his name on — TV scripts. It's thin stuff: i.e. while there are some funny moments — mostly supplied by Allen — the writer, Walter Bernstein, and the director, Martin Ritt, (who were themselves blacklisted) seem to think it's enough hat we share their outrage over the situation. It isn't, but of interest for Woody Allen fans. Zero Mostel, Herschel Bernardie, Andrea Marcovicci. PG. 3, 5, 7, and 9 with matinees dropping during the week.

PLAZA III THEATRE, 1223 Main Street, 254-7960

"Redneck Miller." This one sports lots of violence, but that's all we know. R. 1:40, 3:30, 5:20, 7:10, and 9.

RICHLAND MALL I THEATRE, Richland Mall, 782-2228

"Pony Express." Horsey pic about the early mail service for another week. Slim Pickens. G. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9; no matinees next week.

RICHLAND MALL II THEATRE, Richland Mall, 782-2228

"Across the Great Divide." Double play for this one also. G. 1, 3, 5, 7, and 9; no matinees next week. The late show here on the 26th and 27th at 11:15 will be "M*A*S*H"
